Andrew Campbell is an expert on domestic violence and associated risks of harm for adults, children, and animals residing in these homes. He provides education for victim-serving agencies across the country on a variety of violence-related topics and assists in developing community-specific responses to physical and emotional violence in the home. Andrew works closely with domestic violence shelters, child protection programs, police departments, and animal control agencies to improve cross-discipline communication and collaboration. His recently published study in the Journal of Interpersonal Violence is the first in literature to utilize police officer observations and reports from the scene to quantify risk in homes where intimate partner violence and pet abuse co-occur.
