Matthew is currently the Senior Research Project Coordinator for the New Jersey Coordination Center which was established by the Institute for Families at Rutgers University, School of Social Work. Matthew has previously worked as a public health investigator for the New Jersey Autism Study. He is a graduate of Montclair State University with a master's degree in psychology and after graduation Matthew continues to work as a Professor in the Department of Psychology teaching: Introduction to Research Methodology, Introduction to Statistics, and Experimental Design. Matthew brings 7+ years of experience in qualitative and quantitative research methodology, data collection, and data analysis. His work has tied him closely to Federal and State agencies, academic institutions and community based mental health practitioners.